10 Selected Publications and their Context

I published more than 100 refereed and unrefereed articles, preprints, reports, proceedings, books and book sections. The below selection of 10 of my peer-reviewed research papers is a snapshot of different aspects of my work. Please note that in Computer Science, significant developments are usually reported in conference and workshop publications, rather than journal articles.

My research touches various domains, such as Data Science, Information Retrieval, Artificial Intelligence, Natural Language Processing, Information Science, Digital Libraries and Human-Computer Interaction. My academic journey began with my work on a probabilistic logic-based framework for Information Retrieval, which is described in [10] and combines concepts from Databases and Information Retrieval. Parts of this [6] were later reused in a successful private consultancy project. During my time as a postdoc at the University of Glasgow, I contributed significantly to the formulation of an interactive information access framework that utilises the maths behind quantum mechanics [9, 8]. My work contributed to the successful application to the highly competitive EU Horizon 2020 European Training Network scheme. The resulting QUARTZ project fully funded 13 PhD students in total working on quantum-inspired interactive information access [4]. Later on, I started working on Bibliometric-enhanced Information Retrieval [7] with its application in academic search and recommendation. This paper started my engagement in the highly successful Bibliometric-enhanced Information Retrieval workshop series (<https://sites.google.com/view/bir-ws/home>). Our bibliometric-enhanced Information Retrieval approaches are used to tackle information overload in the scholarly domain, an emerging research topic we are working on in the context of our EU Horizon 2020 Staff Exchange project OMINO [2], with me as workpackage leader. Since an effective user experience and user interfaces are key for information access, “one size fits all”-type solutions are often not sufficient. Our work on cross-cultural user interface designs addresses these issues [3]. Lately, generative AI, retrieval-augmented generation and large language models (LLMs) had a significant impact due to its huge amount of opportunities, but also several potential threats and shortcomings. Our ongoing work on authorship attribution, with the potential application of detecting LLM-generated forged texts, is one example of how to use generative AI responsibly [1]. My work on AI-driven user-centric Information Access and Retrieval has several applications, for instance in digital humanities and digital libraries [10], eCommerce [6], academic search [7] or cyberstalking detection [5]. My work, while having a Computer Science, Data Science and AI focus, has always combined elements of different user-centred disciplines – for example Information Science (e.g. cognitive [8] and behavioural [4] models), Human-Computer-Interaction [3], Scientometrics [7] and Digital Humanities [10]. This amalgamation of system-oriented and user-oriented research leads towards a new machine-in-the-loop (MITL) paradigm in AI and Information Retrieval. In contrast to, and as a possible extension of, the well-known human-in-the-loop (HITL) paradigm, the user-driven MITL focusses on the user being in charge and the final decision maker for example for the interactive information seeking process – in contrast to HITL, where the user plays a more passive role in a data-driven process.

I contributed to all papers either as main author [10, 8, 6, 5], as collaborator significantly contributing my ideas to the formulation and evaluation of frameworks [9] and perspectives [2], or as PhD supervisor discussing and providing ideas and critically challenging but also encouraging students [7, 4, 3, 1]. I was directly involved in the write-up and discussion of all papers.
